A new search facility has been developed by the Australian National Library to harness the interests of Australian researchers, encouraging them to correct scanned digital records of early Australian newspapers. Numerous interesting anecdotes have been discovered about early earthquakes and progress in observatory seismology in Australia. These data are important for extending existing short databases back from the arrival of Europeans in Australia with their penchant for written ‘news’ to the pre- and early-instrumental period.